A RUSSIAN SCANDAL

General Gresser Raids a Supposed Nibilistic Meeting

AND FINDS A HIGH-TONED DANCE

Where Men and Women High in Aristocratic Russian Circles and Foreign Diplomats Were Engaged in a Bacchanalian Revelry-Women Arrayed in Grecian Costumes Dance and Drink with Army Officers and Noblemen-The Czar Flies into a Rage on Being Informed of the BERLIN, Jan. 19 .- Berlin society is discussing a St. Petersburg scandal, to which no one dares to refer openly. Most of the fifty or more principals are Russians, but a few of them are aristocratic Germans, some of them the highest officials.

The St. Petersburg police recently informed the Czar that many men in his councils and in Russian official life attended frequent Nihilistic meetings at a mansion in a fashionable street. These gatherings were peculiar for the large number of foreign diplomatists, especially Germans, who went to them. The visitors arrived between 9 and 11 p. m. and straggled away at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning. The police watched the house four weeks before they received orders to raid it. They were then sure that a tremendous Nihilistic plot was butching and a force of 200 plot was hatching and a force of 200 police was called out to make it sure that not a single participant escaped. The police were supported by four companies of soldiers within call and were panies of soldiors within call and were directed by General Gresser and a small body of detectives. The house in which the meetings were held was surrounded last Monday night by this little body at midnight, when the usual number of visitors had been seen to enter. General Gresser, who had carried the password, gained admittance to the closed vestibule. He was closely followed by his detectives. vestibule. He his detectives.

BROKE UP A SCENE OF REVELRY.

The doorkeeper was thrown down and gagged, the inner door was smashed with an ax, and with drawn revolvers the detectives and policemen, led by General Gresser, burst through. They were astounded to find themselves, instead of in the sombre proceedings of a revolutionary meeting, at the open en-trance of a brilliant ballroom, filled with music and flowers and gay with national colors. Some forty men and women in light, flowing Grecian cos-tumes, were dancing. At small tables tumes, were dancing. At small tables in the corners half-intoxicated couples drank champagne, and in small, private rooms at the back several more couples were found dining and drinking freely. To the mutual surprise and dismay of General Gresser and his officers the fifty or sixty persons participating in the orgies were found to be men and women in the highest St. Petersburg society. Several of the women were known to be received with favor at court and among the received with favor at court, and among the men were Russian officers of high rank and representa-tives of foreign legations in the capital. To relieve the mutual embarrassment

To relieve the mutual embarrassment temporarily, General Gresser took the names and official titles of all the men and official titles of the husbands of all the women, and then hustled everybody out of the house. No prisoner was taken to jail by the police. All, however, received the next day paternal admonitions or culls, according to his greater or less enjoyment of imperial favor, from the Czar Alexander.

HOW THE PARTICIPANTS ENTERED. The fashionable house at which the orgies were held was found to be owned by a Russian Jew, who rented it to the by a Russian Jew, who rented it to the principals, as the debauchers were politely termed. The police had been deceived as to the nature of the gatherings there by the fact that every attendant entered in male attire, for a rule of the society was that, for the sake of safety, the women must come in coats and trousers. Each carnival was devoted to the initiation of the dress and customs of a particular nation. On the night of the raid everything was Grecian.

Grecian.

General Gresser went to the Czar with his report in the expectation that his sovereign would be relieved and pleased by the explosion of the theory of a dynamite plot. The Czar, however, was in a rage when he heard details of the corruption prevalent among the noblemen in his army. The result of the examination of the names submitted by General Gresser was that many Russian officers and officials were transferred to places in the provinces and that two secretaries of legation were compelled to take long vacations. Two married women who participated in the Grecian night have been excluded from court and another left the city before she was asked to go.

A list of the Germans involved in the scandal was sent by the Czar to Emperor William and the hope was expressed in the Czar's accompanying letter that the offenders would be punished severely. An inquiry will be made into the St. Petersburg matter and into the night life of the Berlin officials, whom the emperor suspects of being immoral, as he has shown in several communications and remarks to commanders of garrisons in large cities. The stock market to-day was both active and decidedly weak, the pressure against the list being continued, and the supposed imminent war with Chile was again one of the most prominent topics of conversation on the street and important cause of weakness. The traders were all on the short side to-day, and considerable selling by bulls, who have held on too long, went to make up the large business of the day, and while there was some covering to take profits on the decline of the last few days, which did steady the market in the last part of the afternoon, and some sustaining orders in a few stocks, the pressure was so heavy and persistent that the downward movement, after a very weak opening, was almost steady throughout the greater portion of the day. The close was quite unsettled, though a firmer temper existed, owing to the raily.
